NOTES

The present exhibition is a small one and is not in any sense representative of what is being done in the wide field of the decorative arts, either in this country or abroad. It is suggestive, rather, of the trend of modern design,—the tendency away from the direct imitation of nature and in the direction of highly stylized forms, away from the reiteration of Greek, Egyptian, and Oriental motives towards patterns suggested by the things we see about us. One senses in it, too, the influence of modern science and machinery.

These tendencies are seen in a wide range of materials—in the treatment of furniture and wall paper, textiles, ceramics, metal, and glass, and one finds them in varying degree in the arts of nine different countries. In fact, such an exhibition emphasizes the international character of contemporary art.

The story of the printed silk called Metropolis (No. 54) is a typical one: it is said to have been inspired by a German film, designed in Paris by an artist of Spanish descent, and produced in America for the American market.
